In this article, we estimate firm-level markups and test some micro-level predictions of a model of international trade with heterogeneous firms and endogenous markups. Our theoretical framework is an extended version of the Melitz and Ottaviano (2008, Review of Economic Studies 75, 295-316) (MO) model that features both quality and spatial differentiation across firms.

This paper explores how the emergence of the “new regionalism” and a surge in direct investment relate to each other and to the theory of international trade. Reform in the East and South—the most significant economic event of our era—plays a central role. Countries anxious to implement economic reform establish preferential trading arrangements with industrial countries intended to ...

In reality, many of the arguments in favor of regionalism are far less convincing than they seem. It is hard to see how achieving free trade is any easier in a vast regional arrangement like the FTAA than in the WTO. The FTAA would cover all but one of the 35 countries in the Americas, which differ greatly in size, outlook and level of development.
